Theatre's future depends on summer ticket sales

By Pankaj Khadka
The Chronicle News

The ticket sales over the summer would determine the future of the city's only theatre company and whether the door to the Famous Performing Arts Center stays open or closes, said the theatre's executive director.

Harriett Vaugeois, also the board president of Southern Colorado Repertory Theatre, said if the ticket sales for the current season does not pick up by the end of the summer, the center could have to close the doors.

"We have contracts and we've brought people from all over the United States and these are people we will pay. But if we get to the end of the summer and we have a zero balance, then we can't stay open. We can't provide opportunities for children, we can't have a performing arts center," said Vaugeois.

Currently in the middle of its professional season that started on June 21, the plays at the theatre averaged ten to 20 people more per performance than last year in previous weekends, which Vaugeois said, was very encouraging.

In a 125-seat theatre, the shows have been averaging 60 per show, which is enough to keep the theatre running. However, starting last Thursday, the ticket sales for the remainder of the season really slowed down, she noted.

"For Thursday, we had only sold six tickets, two to a local couple and four to people from Denver. And that is not good for Trinidad to have people come down from Denver to see the Famous Performing Arts Center and a professional theatre company and only have two other people in the audience," Vaugeois said.

Before the professional season started, the theatre company estimated its expected average attendance and expected revenue for the season, and on that basis hired actors, scheduled shows, and made renovations to the facility.

"Instead of getting bigger as season progressed, the advance sales have gotten smaller, and Vaugeois fears that everyone locally that plan to come to the shows have already come, leading to the drop in sales.

"So now, we are personally calling people, but that's really time consuming. And every time I'm with a group of people, I need to let them know this is not a sales pitch or a ploy. I'm being very realistic that SCRT, in creating this theatre, spent all of the reserves that we had.

"And the board said, 'We so believe this is going to be a tremendous economic stimulus for this community that we're willing to say hire the actors, assume the debt, we're going to make this happen.' And we can

For Perry Self, play is the thing

Special to The Chronicle-News

RATON - The boyish excitement is unmistakable even from the stage, 20 feet below where Perry Self perches high in the Shuler Theater's 98-year-old rigging that raises and lowers the various backdrops.

"I'm getting to work with 1915 technology that I've only seen in textbooks," he says. "It's a fully mechanical system, no electricity. It uses hemp rope!" To his theater friends around the country, he sends a photo of himself at the pin rail operating the fly system in the shadows far above the Shuler stage. They're awed at his good fortune.

Self spends every summer acting and directing with theater companies around the U.S. This summer he's in Raton to star as murderous dentist Mitchell Lavell in the Shuler's comedy romp "Murder at the Howard Johnson's," and as Noah's son Ham in the Shuler's musical comedy "Two by Two." The show he's most excited about, though, is the one he's not even in. He's directing "Steel Magnolias," which opens Thursday night and runs through August 3.

Screenwriter Robert Harling based the beloved 1989 movie on his own 1987 play of the same title. Set in Natchitoches, Louisiana, the film featured an all-star cast that included Julia Roberts, Sally Field, Dolly Parton, Shirley MacLaine, Daryl Hannah, Olympia Dukakis, Dylan McDermott and Sam Shepherd.

The play's cast of six women is played by local actors Jillian Solano, Brenda Ferri, Janese Little, Adrienne Coleman, Tess Neary, and newcomer Susan Ward. The title refers to the women, who can be as gentle as magnolias but tough as steel.

"It's all about strong female relationships," Self says. "How do we deal with the thousand natural shocks that flesh is heir to?" The answer, he says, is to rely on the people around us. "I want people to leave the theater feeling a deep appreciation for the people in their lives. What a blessing those relationships are, in good times and bad."

Self's directing style is perfectly suited to the small ensemble. Spending as much of his professional career acting as directing,

Monday morning, members of the Trinidad Knights of Columbus load a U-Haul truck with donated clothes, shoes, and toys, among other things, which will be heading to an Indian Reservation near Gallup, NM. Once a year, the overflow from the St. Vincent de Paul thrift store is sent to different areas for the needy.

he's "an actor's director" with a special penchant for collaboration and experimentation. "I love to work with each actor to uncover the character and develop the part. In rehearsal, I encourage the actors to take risks, try things, experiment and be creative. It's an exciting period of discovery, not just memorizing lines and getting the blocking down.

"It makes rehearsal a lot of fun," he says. The goal, of course, is for the audience to feel the electricity coming from the performances and stories on the stage.

Self has been at this most of his life. He earned his BA in theater at Cal State Northridge, then went to Roosevelt University in Chicago to earn his MA in theater with an emphasis in directing. At Northridge he met his wife in the theater department and they've often worked together ever since.

They were obviously made for each other. Besides their shared professions and collaborations in the theater, there's the matter of their names. He's Perry Dean Self; she's Peggy Jean Self. You can't make this stuff up.

They work together at Highland High School in Palmdale, California, where Peggy teaches acting and directs plays. Perry directs and teaches stagecraft, but he spends the majority of his day teaching math. Both are active in other area theaters, especially at Antelope Valley College where Perry has directed "Man of La Mancha," which allowed him to choreograph fight scenes, a specialty he's used in "Romeo and Juliet" and other plays. He loves stage combat and even studied it with the Society of American Fight Directors.

Just before driving to New Mexico last month with his two bicycles racked on his car, he directed the opera "La Traviata" at Antelope Valley College. In each of the past three years, he's directed an opera there - "Marriage of Figaro," "The Magic Flute," and "Rigoletto."

In the summers, he takes far-flung directing jobs, including "The Miracle Worker" and, last summer at the Bloomington Center for the Performing Arts in Illinois, "Cats."

Shuler Theater audiences have already enjoyed his comedic acting in two plays this summer. Self is excited to present the Kaleidoscope Players' production of "Steel Magnolias" this week, delving deeper into relationships and emotions. If it works as planned, audience members will

A year after slayings, shooter still a mystery

By Dan Elliott
Associated Press

DENVER (AP) — His face was hidden behind a gas mask, and he was costumed from head to toe in a police-style helmet, black cargo pants and black vest. He was such an improbable sight, standing at the front of a theater where a Batman movie was playing, that some in the audience thought he was part of the show.
Then he started shooting.
A year later, the pale and boyish face of James Egan Holmes is in plain view each time he shuffles into court to face charges of planning and executing his onslaught. But whatever illness or evil might have seized the promising young neuroscientist and contorted him into a mass killer, as prosecutors allege, is still hidden — this time by a mask of a different sort.
Random and disjointed fragments of Holmes' story have emerged, but they don't add up to a coherent story line. They look more like a garbled and fleeting video, a quiet life that explodes in a choreographed nightmare of violence.
Holmes is accused of killing 12 people and injuring 70 in the suburban Denver theater on July 20, 2012. He has pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity, and his lawyers say he carried out the shootings "in the throes of a psychotic episode." But they battle fiercely to keep the details of his mental state a secret, and they say nothing about how it might have set off the rampage.
What is known is deeply contradictory.
As a teen, Holmes was withdrawn and rarely started conversations, according to those who knew him. When he was arrested behind the Aurora theater minutes after the shootings, standing quietly with his hands resting atop his car, he was obedient and eerily limp, police said.

But during the shootings, he allegedly barked out orders and appeared to single individuals out, recalled Stephanie Davies, a witness. "He would shout, 'What are you doing? I said stand up!'" Davies said.
Applying to graduate schools, Holmes strained to leave an impression of stability and maturity. "My life could have gone in a completely different direction had I not possessed the foresight to choose the path of knowledge," he wrote in one application.
But photos exhibited in court show him preening before his smartphone camera like a self-absorbed adolescent on the night before the massacre.
In one, he wore black contact lenses and a black stocking cap, and two tufts of his dyed-orange hair curled out like delicate little horns on either side of his head. In another, he grinned at the camera, a pistol held below his face. A third showed some of his guns and gear laid out on a red sheet on his bed.
As an 18-year-old, Holmes got laughs by telling people one of his ambitions was to own a Sturpee machine.
As a 24-year-old, he went on a weapons spree, buying an assault rifle, a shotgun, two handguns, more than 6,000 rounds of ammunition, high-capacity ammunition magazines, police-style body armor and enough chemicals to rig his apartment into one massive, potentially lethal booby trap, investigators said.
Holmes built crude but complicated detonators meant to lure a neighbor or passer-by into inadvertently setting off the explosives in his apartment at about the time the theater massacre was underway, the investigators said. The idea was to divert police from the theater.
No one took the bait, although one neighbor came perilously close when she went to investigate blaring music that was part of the lure.

"It would have ignited and the whole apartment would have exploded or caught fire," FBI bomb technician Garrett Gumbinner said in January.
Holmes was a sought-after college graduate who won a federal grant for full tuition and $26,000 a year in living expenses for a Ph.D. neuroscience program at the University of Colorado, Denver. But in June of 2012, at the end of his first year, he flunked a major exam, and his professors advised him to find another career, prosecutors said.
Holmes quit the program that month.
In court, Holmes has spoken just two words aloud — "yeah" and "no," both in answer to the judge. He looked dazed at his first hearings, and later he appeared awe-struck. But now he mostly looks nonchalant, and nothing in any of his expressions indicates what's going on inside his head.
Citing a judge's gag order and privacy laws, those who know the most about Holmes' life in Colorado say little. But there were hints along the way that his life had taken a sharp and dangerous turn.
In March 2012, four months before the shootings, he told a classmate "about wanting to kill people ... and that he would do so when his life was over," prosecutors said in a filing.
Prosecutors also said he opened accounts at two dating websites in 2012 and wrote in his profile, "Will you visit me in prison?"
In June, about five weeks before the shootings, a psychiatrist who had been treating Holmes told a campus police officer that Holmes had made "homicidal statements" and threatened her. Holmes started seeing the psychiatrist, Dr. Lynne Fenton of the University of Colorado, Denver — for reasons unexplained — sometime after he joined the university neuroscience program in 2011.
None of the warnings or the bizarre reversals in Holmes' behavior answers the critical question: Why would a seemingly harmless college student, without so much as a traffic ticket on his record, amass an outlandish arsenal, dye his hair orange and stage a wanton and theatrical attack on hundreds of innocent strangers?
Some answers may come during Holmes' trial, scheduled to start in February. Holmes will undergo a mental evaluation at the state hospital this summer, and the results will be part of his insanity defense.
But even that could stay hidden.
Holmes' attorneys have said he could withdraw his insanity plea based on the examination. If that happens, the results may never be made public.

In court, Holmes has spoken just two words aloud — "yeah" and "no," both in answer to the judge. He looked dazed at his first hearings, and later he appeared awe-struck. But now he mostly looks nonchalant, and nothing in any of his expressions indicates what's going on inside his head.
Citing a judge's gag order and privacy laws, those who know the most about Holmes' life in Colorado say little. But there were hints along the way that his life had taken a sharp and dangerous turn.
In March 2012, four months before the shootings, he told a classmate "about wanting to kill people ... and that he would do so when his life was over," prosecutors said in a filing.
Prosecutors also said he opened accounts at two dating websites in 2012 and wrote in his profile, "Will you visit me in prison?"
In June, about five weeks before the shootings, a psychiatrist who had been treating Holmes told a campus police officer that Holmes had made "homicidal statements" and threatened her. Holmes started seeing the psychiatrist, Dr. Lynne Fenton of the University of Colorado, Denver — for reasons unexplained — sometime after he joined the university neuroscience program in 2011.
None of the warnings or the bizarre reversals in Holmes' behavior answers the critical question: Why would a seemingly harmless college student, without so much as a traffic ticket on his record, amass an outlandish arsenal, dye his hair orange and stage a wanton and theatrical attack on hundreds of innocent strangers?
Some answers may come during Holmes' trial, scheduled to start in February. Holmes will undergo a mental evaluation at the state hospital this summer, and the results will be part of his insanity defense.
But even that could stay hidden.
Holmes' attorneys have said he could withdraw his insanity plea based on the examination. If that happens, the results may never be made public.

Theatre's future with ticket sales, but now we're not seeing those sales," said Vaugeois.

Despite all the challenges, the season has also had some positives as well. At least 50% of people buying tickets and coming to the shows are from outside of Trinidad that have been eating at the restaurants in town, and staying overnight, contributing to the local economy and making SCRT the economic stimulus it hoped to be.

Vaugeois said the same shows at the Famous with the same set of actors would cost $60 to $10 per ticket in places like Denver, and people here can enjoy that for only $25, which is what the company needs to stay alive.
She called on the families of children who have been part of SCRT and through its training programs and encouraged them to bring the kids to see professional actors perform.

"The cost of a child's ticket at $15 to see New York quality actors in their own hometown is a part of their training that's critically important. And we need people to encourage their neighbors to try something new because for the most part, a lot of times, it's just hard for people to walk across the threshold for the first time," said the executive director.

The theatre has not received any grants and funds from either the city or other entities, and is solely dependent on the ticket sales. While it is financed to get through for the summer, the future will be solely determined by the rest of the season.

If 20 additional people that are not buying tickets were to attend the shows, the theatre would be okay, noted Vaugeois.
"That's how close we are. But it's also how scary it is when I can see that the talking about it is bigger than ever. To hear the buzz get bigger and the sales not get bigger, that's what puts me in a panic mode."

Self couldn't be happier with his summer.
"Getting to work in this theater is phenomenal," he says. "And working with this group has been phenomenal. The support for the arts that you guys have in this small town blows my mind, because you don't get it like that where I come from."

Trinidad Lake fully reopens to boating

Trinidad Lake has been fully reopened to boating and all other activities. The lake was temporarily closed for several days last week while firefighting efforts were underway on two fires near Trinidad. County, state and federal firefighting resources were using the lake to fill firefighting aircraft with water for fire drops. With the fire now contained, the lake is fully opened for boats. Please keep in mind that the Trinidad Lake State Park is still under a Stage I fire ban per Las Animas County. Anyone planning a cookout or campfire in the park should call ahead or check the park's website for updated information.
