Andrew (Robert Garcia) and Meredith (Amanda Mehn) look back over life, as they grow from kids through life as teenagers and middle age.

Andrew (Robert Garcia) recalls a memory as played out as teenagers by Liz Strnad (Meredith) and Patchamannie Bernal (Andrew) in the inaugural play of the newly reformed Raton High Drama club.

Raton Youth Production 'Why Do We Laugh' answers its own question

It's been four years since a Raton High School Drama Club mounted a play or entered the esteemed annual Eastern New Mexico University Drama Festival in Portales. With last weekend's delightful "Why Do We Laugh" at the Shuler Theatre, co-produced with the Raton Youth Theater, Raton's teens have made a triumphant return to the theatre scene.

Stephen Gregg's one-act comedy portrays a couple at four stages of life. In a clever staging, instead of showing the four ages in sequence with two actors on stage at a time, four pairs of actors are on stage simultaneously almost throughout the play.

In a sandbox at the front of the stage are five-year-old Andrew and six-year-old Meredith. On chairs off to the right, Andy and Meredith are 15 and 16, talking to each other on telephones. To the left, 44-year-old Andy is reading the newspaper while Meredith reads a book. On a couch atop a riser at the back of the stage are Andy and Meredith at 66 and 67.

Thanks to Bill Donati's capable lighting design, the staging works flawlessly. As spirited small children, Jeff Redlick and Dale Proctor threaten to steal all attention to the sandbox front and center, but then the light leaves them and they go still, literally yielding the spotlight to Patchamannie Bernal and Liz Strnad, the teens tied to telephones. Bernal and Strnad show all the awkwardness and excitement of two teenagers inching toward love, circa 1957.

Chris Fissel and Stevie Hayden ably portray Andy and Meredith in their mid-40s, but more focused on their reading than on each other. Robert Garcia and Amanda Mehn build a convincing case that love does survive, giving us an elderly couple with tender familiarity and humor intact. The spotlight continues to move around, revisiting the couple many times at each stage of their life together.

The hidden weapon here is artistic director Gail Dixon-Willden, who arrived in Raton last summer after 14 years teaching theatre in Farmington, twice taking her Piedra Vista High School troupe to state championships. Since earning a masters degree in directing, Dixon-Willden has directed more than 75 productions, including Raton's most recent incarnation of "A Christmas Carol." Though her influence is layered throughout the production of "Why Do We Laugh", it's most evident in the performances of her young actors, all of whom comfortably and convincingly inhabit their characters. After four years without a theatre program, and just twelve rehearsals over four weeks, this is no small feat.

Producer/sponsor Bill Crary and technical director Cian Hazen brought their considerable experience and talents to the production, aided by impressive work from an all-student crew of Mariah Fleming, Seth Romero, Peyton Richards, Synovia Duncan, Mallorie Richards, and Erica Hopper.

The net result of this combined effort is a 30-minute comedy that is funny, insightful and moving. Back on the couch, the elderly Andrew labors over his own obituary as Meredith knits beside him, adding frequent corrections to Andrew's memories. In fact, Andrew is having trouble harnessing his memories. We finally come to see, as Andrew does, that these other couples on stage are the stuff of his life, his memories, which one by one leave the stage, leaving us alone with Andrew and Meredith as they turn their attentions...toward dinner.

Raton's teens have created a multi-layered production that would reward multiple viewings. It's too bad there were only two public performances. However, before leaving early Wednesday morning to take their play to the festival in Portales, they'll present an encore performance at the Shuler Theatre Tuesday night at 7:00 pm. Open free to the public this time - they'll be accepting donations - many who saw the show over the weekend will return, glad for another chance.
