

Sue Fleming honored as Raton Treasure

Steett, former chairman of the New Mexico State Arts Commission, wrote, "Sue Fleming was one of those most responsible for the recent development of the arts in the State of New Mexico. She was vice-chair of the commission during a time of transition and growth, and her leadership and initiative made a tremendous contribution to the outstanding Arts Division we have today."

Locally, Fleming has served as the Raton Chamber of Commerce director, Raton Main Street director, RAHC director, and owner/CEO of Artists International, an agency booking performers on national tours. She was instrumental in creating the Raton Treasure award, which has also been awarded to such local arts luminaries as Marv Newton and Bill Fegan. She currently serves as president of the RAHC board of directors.

In remarks to her well-wishers, Fleming thanked all, then gave an impassioned speech in support of the arts, the very sort of advocacy which led to her being named the 2009 Raton Treasure.

She especially praised the Raton Junior Arts Council, comprised of local high school students, as the future of the growing arts community in Raton. She built a persuasive case for her most compelling line, "The arts are the expressions of our souls."

Trinidad minister is set to travel to Pakistan to fulfill his mission

"Pakistan is the only Muslim nation that has taken a stand against the Taliban and Al-Qaida. There is a lot of turmoil there but it has opened the door for the Gospel. We're going and believing in God for miracles to happen there. Pakistan is a hot spot in the world but somebody has to go there to preach the Word."

"When your pastor goes there, you are all going there with him," John told the Trinidad church congregation. "I want what God wants (and that) is more important than what His people want."

But providing security for such a mission into a world hot spot is first and foremost. Just to obtain their visas for the trip, they are going to Pakistan officially as "teachers" rather than as ministers.

Nelson estimated from online research that only about 2 percent of Muslim Pakistan has converted to Christianity but noted that John, who was born into a Pakistani Christian family, thought that number was much higher with many of the country's new converts having to keep their newfound religious faith and beliefs well hidden from public view and government scrutiny. Pakistan, considered America's only true friend and ally among the world's Islamic countries, is also probably the only country that would allow Christian crusades to take place inside its borders.

Ironically, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has also been in Pakistan for high-level meetings during the past week to discuss all the bombing attacks.

Nelson said the large group of ministers would be protected by 25-armed security guards at any one time to prevent possible hostile disruptions of their services.

This is the Nelson family's first trip to a foreign country to conduct evangelistic services. Neither has been outside North America before. Cary and Michelle both admitted to feeling a little apprehensive with thoughts crossing their minds of what might happen to them in a war-torn country where violence is the order of the day. Cary Nelson said his heart is telling him to follow God's calling to do the mission and God will protect him and his family from any harm. "It crosses your mind of what might happen but I really haven't worried about it. We'll be fine."

"We're expecting God to manifest lots of miracles and healings at our services," said Nelson. Needless to say, son Decklyn will also be having the experience of a lifetime. As an ORU student, Cary Nelson said his son had to get permission from his dean of students and each of his instructors to take time away from his studies to make the trip. Fortunately, ORU is well known for its worldwide evangelical missions.

Nelson said it's his understanding that all their meetings will be videotaped and he will be bringing copies back to Trinidad for viewing here as well as for distribution through their regular video network.

Methane gas controversy still causes concern in Walsenburg

By Judith Kohler
Associated Press Writer

WALSENBURG, Colo. (AP) — Bernice and Jerry Angely like to show visitors the singed T-shirt a friend was wearing when their water well exploded and shot flames 30 feet high.

The friend wasn't hurt. But that and an explosion at another home weeks earlier forced Colorado to suspend natural gas drilling around this southern plains town until someone could find out why dangerous levels of methane were getting into the groundwater.

Two years later, Walsenburg and surrounding Huerfano County are still waiting, its residents caught in a collision between two of the West's vital resources: Water and natural gas.

"The water is so saturated with methane and other chemicals it is not to be used for human consumption," said Bernice Angely, who's had water trucked to her home 10 miles west of town since her well blew up in July 2007.

Petroglyph Energy Inc., a Boise, Idaho-based firm that has worked the rolling plains of the Raton Basin since 1999, suspended drilling until it can stem the methane. Colorado also is rewriting rules that had allowed Petroglyph to discharge water runoff from its drilling into streams and creeks.

But Petroglyph says it's not clear the drilling caused the methane leaks or prompted other area water wells to run dry. Eying what it calls an extremely promising natural gas field, it believes a shallow water formation tapped by area homeowners isn't connected to a deeper one pumped by the company for its drilling operations.

Petroglyph chief operating officer Paul Powell also believes a growing number of new homes in the area could explain some of the dry water wells.

"We'll do what we need to do," Powell said, stressing that his firm is working with the state on a solution.

In this photograph taken on Monday, Aug. 10, 2009, Melanie and Ben Bounds stand next to a shed damaged when a build up of methane blew off the roof on their land outside of Walsenburg, Colo. Area residents are experiencing problems with their wells since drilling for natural gas started around the southeast Colorado community. (AP Photo/Judith Kohler)

Petroglyph has a plan to prevent the flow of methane into water wells by creating a hydraulic barrier. The company has proposed pumping water from an underground formation and injecting it into a row of wells where gas drilling occurs. Powell said gas will migrate into a void, and "if the void is full of water, there isn't room for gas to migrate through it."

State regulators say the plan is plausible but that Petroglyph needs to prove it works. Democratic U.S. Rep. John Salazar, who farms in the nearby San Luis Valley, has asked the U.S. Geological Survey to weigh in by evaluating the area's water quality and formations to determine if the gas drilling is to blame for the problems.

Water coursing through porous rock and streams has allowed farming, ranching and new subdivisions to thrive in the semiarid area about 160 miles south of Denver.

It also helps trap methane gas in the vast coal seams that once made the area a mining hot spot. The coal mines are gone, but the methane that made digging for it dangerous is a valuable resource. Companies like Petroglyph pump huge volumes of water out of the ground to relieve the pressure trapping the natural gas.

Steve Gunderson, director of Colorado's water quality control division, said Petroglyph will have to build a water treatment plant before it gets a new permit to discharge water. The old permit allowed Petroglyph to release up to 8 million gallons of water daily.

Fourth-generation dairy farmer Brett Corsentino blames the discharges into the Cucharas River for ruining his corn crops. He uses river water to irrigate his crops just a few miles east of the homeowners having problems with their wells. He says the high levels of sodium in the wastewater has diminished his soil's ability to absorb water and stunted the corn's growth.

"They say, 'Well, there's no proof,'" Corsentino said. "Well, we'd been getting along for generations just fine until they started pumping 8 million gallons out of this country."

Corsentino also says his herd suffered abnormally high birth and death rates and now numbers 400, down from 650. He believes the cows consumed too much sodium from the water and corn grown from it. His corn used to produce 6,000 tons of silage; this year's crop yielded 1,500 tons.

However, Corsentino says his herd is healthier and milk production has increased since drilling stopped.

"There's an obvious direct, substantial impact to Brett Corsentino's dairy," the state's Gunderson said of the drilling.

Petroglyph paid for soil tests on Corsentino's farm. They showed high levels of sodium but that it also needed more calcium, Powell said. Petroglyph and Corsentino are discussing possible treatments.

"We still don't believe we have liability for the situation," Powell said. "But we were willing to help him fix his land and get back to productivity."

Ten miles west of Walsenburg, a rushing sound emanates from a pipe that vents methane from Ben and Melanie Bounds' water well. The pipe was installed after a June 2007 explosion blew off a shed roof covering the well.

The Bounds had moved from Dallas to build what they call their dream home atop a hill with a breathtaking view of the Spanish Peaks. They say their problems started when Petroglyph began drilling nearby. They're suing the company and haul water from town to their cistern.

"If I could run the clock back, we'd have never tried this," Ben Bounds said.

"I had more methane coming out of my water well than they had out of any of their gas wells. It sounded like a locomotive going down the road," said Kent Smith, who also has a methane detector in his house. "The damage and the problems they've caused have got to be addressed, and they keep getting pushed aside and forgotten about."

Petroglyph insists it's a good neighbor. Despite the methane mystery, it's trucking water to 14 area homes and has supplied 15 homes with methane alarm systems.
