Polar Plunge for Colorado Special Olympics coming to Trinidad Lake State Park Feb. 29

Eric John Monson
The Chronicle-News

The Trinidad Parks and Recreation Advisory Board with the help of the Trinidad Police Department and others is bringing the Special Olympics Colorado Polar Plunge to Trinidad Lake and Trinidad Lake State Park on Saturday, Feb. 29. The event will be open for registration at 11 a.m. the morning of the plunge with action taking place from Noon to 2 p.m.

The Polar Plunge is a signature fundraiser for Special Olympics Colorado (SOCO) and allows individuals, organizations and businesses to show support and raise money for Special Olympic athletes by jumping into frigid water.

“I spoke to one of the officers after they had done the Polar Plunge in Pueblo and I asked why not Trinidad?” said Trinidad Parks and Recreation Advisory Board member Linda Lamden. “Then I was put in touch with then Sergeant DuRan, now Captain Dan DuRan and he said there was no reason we couldn't get it done and he did some work to get us started.” Lamden and board members

Trinidad Mayor Rico talks city's governance, Home Rule Charter to chamber luncheon goes

Garrett Watson
The Chronicle-News

On Wednesday, Jan. 15 the Trinidad and Las Animas County Chamber of Commerce hosted their monthly luncheon with The City of Trinidad as this month's sponsor. Following commentary from several businesses and organizations, Mayor Phil Rico took the podium and presented an informative discussion on the structure of the city and specifics to how the town is governed.

“There are two types of City Governances,” said Rico, “statutory and home rule. Trinidad is governed by Home Rule Charter, which means that there is limited Government interference. Our charter was established Aug. 9, 1993, and charter changes can only be made by majority of registered citizens of Trinidad. Council can recommend changes to the electorate or by electorate petition, which needs to be put on the next election.”

Rico explained that depending on the seat being filled, there were different term lengths and stipulations.

“The governance structure is mayor, six city council members, and city manager,” said Rico. “A mayor pro-tem from within city council is elected by city council

A New Mexico Travelogue Series Part 3: Fort Sumner — trail's end

The drive from Lincoln to Fort Sumner affords plenty of time to imagine horsemen making the same journey 135 years ago. About 100 miles on horseback, 140 miles by today's paved highways, both Billy the Kid and Pat Garrett made this commute countless times. They probably made the ride in two days, carrying food and water and bedrolls along with their firearms.

A trip to White Oaks would take just one day, Mesilla seven. Garrett and the Kid both made trips like this all the time, east into Texas, north as far as Puerto de Luna and Anton Chico near Las Vegas. Life on the trail took up much of their lives. They valued

Chasing Billy the Kid

A New Mexico Travelogue Series Part 3: Fort Sumner — trail's end

Open since 1953, Fort Sumner's Billy the Kid Museum has continually expanded as it's grown to more than 60,000 relics reflecting the history and life of the region. Billy the Kid's chaps, spurs and rifle are among the displays. The Kid was happy in Fort Sumner where he had a girlfriend and many other friends. At one point, the Kid and Pat Garrett were Fort Sumner neighbors. After Billy the Kid's dramatic escape the night of "The Big Killing," Garrett finally captured the Kid 12 miles east of Fort Sumner at Stinking Spring, located down Black Hat Road, above top, just beyond this remote ranch near Taiban. A trip past Santa Rosa's famed Blue Hole (inset top), where scuba divers make pilgrimages to explore the pool's 81-foot-deep crystal-clear spring-fed waters, was part of this journey.

good horses. With the need for quick getaways, horse thieves like Billy always kept the best for themselves.

Hoping for the same great luck I'd had at the Ellis Store Country Inn in Lincoln, I drove straight to the Billy the Kid Country Inn, directly across Highway 60 from the 62-year-old Billy the Kid Museum in Fort Sumner. No luck. The Inn has been contracted to BNSF Railway for three years while its workers build two new bridges over the Pecos River at the western edge of town. They have two years to go.

Although the highway carries thousands of long-distance travelers through Fort Sumner each day, there are few dining and lodging choices available. I stayed at a Super 8 and saw no sign of Billy the Kid.

He called Fort Sumner home for much of his last four years. Pat Garrett lived there at the same time, even working as bartender at Beaver Smith's saloon where Billy liked to gamble and dance. The two spent enough time together that some called them Little Casino and Big Casino. Their paths diverged when Garrett accepted the job of Lincoln County Sheriff.

Their Fort Sumner

hugged the Pecos three miles southeast of today's Fort Sumner, which migrated north to the railway when it came through. I drove down to the Fort Sumner Historic Site on a Monday morning, only to learn that it's fenced in and closed on Mondays and Tuesdays. My luck seemed to have turned since Lincoln. With a sitemap I'd found in town, I could look from a side road and almost tell—all that remains of the buildings are markers—where Beaver Smith's saloon was, where the old Indian hospital was where Garrett laid in ambush for the Regulators, killing Tom Folliard but missing the Kid. I could tell where Pete Maxwell's house was, where, seven months after the botched hospital ambush, Garrett waited in a dark bedroom and killed Billy the Kid.

Barely escaping Garrett's hospital ambush, Billy and four fellow Regulators went on the run. Garrett and his posse followed. Five days later and 12 miles east at a remote crossroads called Stinking Spring, Garrett followed the Regulators' tracks in the snow to a rock-and-adobe structure, 12 by 30 feet with just one doorless opening. It was 3 a.m. He had them pinned.

In the frozen dawn, a man emerged with a feed-bag for the horses outside. He wore a sombrero like Billy's. Garrett and his men filled him with seven rifle shots. They'd killed Charlie Bowdre, not the Kid.

A standoff lasted all day. At one point the bandits tried to pull their horses through the doorway so they could bolt out and make a run for it. Garrett shot and dropped a horse right in the doorway, blocking it.

At the end of a long day that saw many bullets fly but no one else hit, the four desperados emerged with their hands in the air. Billy's penchant for escape had failed him. Garrett escorted all four to Las Vegas, then onto a train south to trial in Mesilla.

Although there's no longer anything there, Stinking Spring is on Google Maps. From Old Fort Sumner I drove east past Taiban to Black Hat Road and turned south, crossing coarse new gravel on the railroad right-of-way, then a mile south to a family ranch house. With only a mile left to Stinking Spring, the road now turned rough, no problem for my pickup at home but too rough, I judged, for the dainty Toyota Prius I was driving on this road trip. My Fort Sumner luck continued. At least I wasn't taken back up Black Hat Road in handcuffs.

It got better, though. The Billy the Kid Museum pulled together everything I'd learned and more. Operated by one family since 1953, they've amassed more than 60,000 items showing the area's rich history. Billy the Kid's chaps, spurs and rifle are there, along with a rock on which he carved his name, and the curtain he passed through just as Pat Garrett shot him to death in Pete Maxwell's house.

The clerk suggested that I start in the mini-theater to watch the 50-minute PBS American Experience documentary "Billy the Kid." It was so good that I ordered my own copy, joining Lincoln Historic Site's large foldout pamphlet and Coloradoan Mark Lee Gardner's "To Hell on a Fast Horse: The Untold Story of Billy the Kid and Pat Garrett" as the perfect introductions to this uniquely American story.

When a traveling photographer arrived in Fort Sumner in 1880, Billy the Kid posed for a tintype portrait that produced four prints, only one of which has survived (center). Until recently, it was the Kid's only photograph. Purchased for $2 at a California memorabilia shop in 2010, a small tintype appears to show Billy the Kid and his Regulator friends playing croquet (top left); the detail here zooms in on the Kid. The tintype, independently appraised and is now insured at $5 million. Pat Garrett (above right) was a Fort Sumner neighbor and close acquaintance of Billy the Kid, serving as bartender at Beaver Smith's saloon where Billy liked to dance and gamble. Their relationship changed when Garrett accepted the job of Lincoln County Sheriff, a job that carried the responsibility of capturing Billy.

A National Geographic documentary premiered in late October with DVD release January 16, 2016. Narrated by Kevin Costner, "Billy the Kid: New Evidence" examines a new photo of Billy the Kid bought at a California memorabilia show in 2010 for $2 and now appraised and insured at $5 million.

The films reminded me of "Young Guns," the popular 1988 Hollywood movie version of Billy the Kid and the Regulators, a good portrayal. I remember our living room outside Las Vegas filled with long clothing racks when my wife, Christina Boyce, made five each of Billy's and the Regulators' costumes for "Young Guns." The movie's Lincoln scenes were all filmed in Cerrillos, near Christina's family home on the Turquoise Trail south of Santa Fe. No longer a costumer, Christina is now the director of Trinidad's A.R. Mitchell Museum of Western Art and brings me True West magazines with Billy the Kid on the cover.

On the way out of Fort Sumner, I stopped at the De Baca County Courthouse and walked upstairs to see Russell Vernon Hunter's three large 1936 WPA murals depicting the area's history. There in one panel was Billy the Kid, his mom, his gray mare, his friends Charlie Bowdre and Tom Folliard, his one-time friend Pat Garrett, and Pete Maxwell and his house where Garrett killed the Kid.

I followed the Pecos north to Puerto de Luna where Billy liked to spend time. The quaint farming village was later the home

A picturesque abandoned church stands beside the highway at Taiban, two miles from where Pat Garrett captured Billy the Kid and killed one of the Kid's fellow Regulators.

Located up the Pecos River from Fort Sumner, the small farming village of Puerto de Luna drew many visits from Billy the Kid. New Mexico novelist Rudolfo Anaya set his classic novel "Bless Me, Ultima" in Puerto de Luna and nearby Santa Rosa, where he grew up.

After opening a school in nearby Puerto de Luna, Russell Vernon Hunter in 1936 painted three historical murals in Fort Sumner's De Baca County Courthouse for the Works Progress Administration (WPA). This panel, still available on the second floor, shows Billy the Kid, center, with his gray mare and many of the central figures in his life, including his mother, his fellow Regulators and Pat Garrett.

of Rudolfo Anaya's mother's family and plays a big part in one of my favorite novels, Anaya's classic New Mexico coming-of-age tale, "Bless Me, Ultima." In nearby Santa Rosa I got my first look at the city's 2007 homage to its native son, a sculptured garden showing Anaya writing, surrounded by pages from his most famous book. Across the park, I got my first look at Santa Rosa's famed Blue Hole, where scuba divers make pilgrimages to explore the pool's 81-foot-deep crystal-clear spring-fed waters.

Driving home past Anton Chico and Las Vegas, I'd spent five days chasing Billy the Kid and Pat Garrett. My route—through Las Vegas, Santa Fe, Mesilla, White Sands, Tularosa, Lincoln, Fort Stanton, Fort Sumner, Puerto de Luna and Santa Rosa—would make an 1100-mile loop from Trinidad. Swinging west to include Silver City would add 120 scenic miles to the trip.

In fact it's all scenic, much of it dramatically so. I hadn't realized that there is no place in New Mexico without mountains. The expanses can appear endless, the distances daunting, reminding me that this is why I moved to New Mexico in the first place: wide open spaces, dramatic landscapes, and a rich tri-cultural history that includes a scrawny kid who laughed easily and loved to dance. He was also a thief, rustler and killer gunned down at the age of 21.

With the exception of a few cities and the long asphalt roadways, my route was remarkably little changed from 135 years ago when Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid travelled these paths incessantly, riding horses day after day, camping night after night, just to get to the next town. I enjoyed the long drives when I'd try to imagine—to see—Garrett or the Kid riding alongside out there. Time after time, I succeeded.

—Editor's note: And so ends Chasing Billy the Kid. From Mesilla to Lincoln and surrounding parts of New Mexico, until the trail ends at Fort Sumner it's been quite an adventure for the arm-chair traveler. Makes a person want to hit the trail for real.
